Community Archaeology on Hadrian's Wall 2019–2022

By Rob Collins, Jane Harrison, Ian Kille, Kathryn Murphy and Kerry Shaw

- Documents the Hadrian's Wall Community Archaeology Project – a highly successful example of direct public engagement in archaeology and heritage conservation
- Features colour photographs throughout
- Includes the personal experiences of the volunteers themselves

Summary of the WallCap community project on Hadrian's Wall describing activities and experiences of the volunteers.

The Hadrian's Wall Community Archaeology Project (WallCAP) was designed to encourage local community engagement in the archaeology and conservation of this World Heritage Site. Packed with colour photographs, this book documents the project's evolution, the range of volunteer activities undertaken, and new discoveries revealed by archaeological fieldwork – including exciting new work around the wall's stones and source geology. Arranged thematically, it features contributions from volunteers themselves, bringing the project into vibrant focus.

About the Author:

Rob Collins is Research Associate in the Department of Archaeology at Newcastle University. His principal research interests are in frontier studies and the collapse of complex societies, making use of archaeological remains of built structures and small finds to provide a social interpretation of the material record.

Jane Harrison is Research Associate and Tutor at the Department for Continuing Education, Oxford University. A graduate of Cambridge and Oxford universities, she completed her D.Phil at Kellogg College, Oxford in 2016, on Norse settlement mounds in the North Atlantic zone.
