INTRODUCTION

Fair pay is vital for the archaeology sector to thrive. Salary benchmarking helps us understand pay trends, compare roles, and advocate for better compensation.

It benefits

- job seekers: see how advertised salaries compare to industry averages.
- employers: set competitive salaries to attract skilled professionals.
- advocates: highlight pay issues and promote fairer wages.

Our approach focuses on providing clear data to the sector on pay in archaeology, focusing on minimum, maximum and average pay for a sample of advertised job roles. This aligns with methods used by other professions and gives us better tools to track trends, compare with similar fields and highlight challenges like the cost-of-living crisis and low pay. Following our interim data report in December, the final results covering 1 April 2024 to 31 March 2025 are published here as a series of charts. The data will underpin ClfA's wider advocacy work on the value of archaeologists and their work to society as well as supporting sector partners in their campaigns for fair pay and recruitment leading to a stronger, more diverse workforce. # Discussion

Drawing comparisons between this year's data and the 2024 benchmarking report is not straightforward. In some categories, the numbers of posts advertised does not constitute a large enough sample size to say anything meaningful and there are variations between the data sets which means we may not always be comparing like with like. The survey does not allow for detailed analysis of job adverts to fully understand how different organisations are using job titles, and the variances in levels of competence or responsibility which may underlie them. There are some general observations we can make however, including the following points of note

- Numbers of fieldwork posts advertised increased significantly from 2023-24. It is often unclear how many roles are available for each advert but there were over 100 adverts for field technician roles in 2024-25. Adverts for supervisor and project officer roles were also up on last year
- Average starting salaries for most of the job titles sampled had increased by more than inflation over the same period. The biggest increase was seen for trainee positions which increased by 8%. The average starting salary for technician roles was up 6% on the previous year
- Average starting salaries for all roles considered to require Practitioner level competence increased by 5% but still fall below the Minimum Income Standard for a single person set by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation of £28,000
- By contrast, finds officer and finds specialist roles only saw a 1% increase. The number of roles advertised had increased from six in 2023-24 to 11 in 2024-25. The benchmarking survey is obviously not picking up on rates for self-employed finds specialists and this would merit a separate study, given the widely reported shortage of finds specialists
- The only category to have seen a decrease on last year's figures was the Consultant category. This excluded senior roles but still reflected significant variation in the level of competence/responsibility expected, ranging from Practitioner to Member level. Starting salaries for entry-level consultant roles were in a similar range to fieldwork trainee positions and this is another area that would merit further investigation, to clarify the responsibilities and competence expected within these posts.

Thank you

The project has benefited greatly from the support of Prospect and BAJR. ClfA welcomes input and collaboration from organisations and individuals across the sector as this work continues to develop. The sustainability of the profession, and its ability to continue to deliver value to society, is dependent on its ability to attract diverse talent and provide sustainable and equitable careers. We all have a role to play, whether as educators, employers, employees or sector representatives, in securing that future.
